

2019 MAJOR – Environmental Humanities

(Qualifying Major for Bachelor of Social Science)

Overlapping threats to global ecosystems and the diversity of planetary life require richer societal responses to the human dimensions of environmental change. The Environmental Humanities major addresses this challenge with its unique focus on the cultural, historical, and ethical contexts of human-environment relationships.

The program aims to develop knowledge bridging humanities and social sciences, to engage more fully and reflexively with current environmental problems and to create new and participatory forms of environmental research and communication essential for negotiating our complex, climate-changing world. The program aims to produce ethically, socially, and environmentally engaged graduates with demonstrated understanding of the theoretical and methodological foundations of humanities-based inquiry by which to evaluate environmental issues and problems.

The table below is a suggested first session for students beginning in Session 2, 2019. Please make your selection of units after reviewing the requirements of your award in the 2019 Handbook:

- You must also meet the general requirements for the degree for which you will qualify.
- It may be possible to satisfy the requirements of your degree by taking a different selection of units in your first session from those suggested above.
- Consider what units you will want to study in second and third year. Prerequisite requirements for those units must be completed prior to enrolment in the higher-level unit.
- For a double major complete required units for both majors where possible in the first year. If considering a double major consult the criteria found at www.handbook.mq.edu.au/2019/Majors.
- You can receive specific program advice from the faculty at any stage in your degree by lodging a “Program Advice” enquiry via <http://ask.mq.edu.au>.
