

2018 Bachelor of Speech, Hearing and Language Sciences

The Bachelor of Speech, Hearing and Language Sciences provides students with an in-depth introduction to wide range of skills and knowledge that can form the basis for future studies and training in Linguistics, Speech and Language Pathology, Audiology, teaching English language to adult learners or editing and publishing, or to research in a wide range of related fields. Students will study in an environment that provides access to one of the best equipped research and clinical environments in the world for speech, hearing, language and cognitive science. They will learn how to analyse languages, to understand what differentiates the worlds' languages and what they have in common. From both technical (e.g. phonetics and syntax) and sociocultural perspectives, they will learn how human speech works and how we produce, perceive and understand spoken language. They will also learn about speech and language and their disorders, or hearing and its disorders.

The table below is a suggested first year program guide to support your enrolment. Please make your selection of units after reviewing the requirements of your award in the 2018 Handbook:
